Miners, eager to strike it rich, descended upon the region, drawn by the allure of silver and gold. The town quickly transformed into a vibrant hub of activity, swelling with hopes and dreams as its population surged. Hotels, saloons, general stores, and dance halls sprang up, catering to the needs of the miners and their families.

Chapter 2: The Boom and Bust Cycle

Like many mining towns, Silver City's fortunes fluctuated with the rise and fall of mineral prices. The boom years were marked by rapid growth and prosperity, as miners struck rich veins of silver and gold. Overnight millionaires emerged, and the town reveled in its newfound wealth.

However, the boom times were not to last. As the mineral deposits dwindled, so too did the prosperity. The mines closed, and miners left in search of new opportunities. By the early 1900s, Silver City was on the decline, rapidly transformed from a thriving metropolis to a ghost town.
