PERSIAN BATH.

The luxurious magnificence of baths in the East is generally known to the reader of travels, so as to render acceptable the following details. They are extracted from Mr. Buckingham's Travels, and bear all the graphic promise of his entertaining pen.

The Bath is one of the principal ones at Kermanshah, an important frontier town of Persia. "It was entered by a porch, extremely clean, and richly decorated by painting and other devices on its ceiling and walls. This remarkable contrast to the low, dark, and foul passages which generally lead to Turkish baths, was a privilege upon the very first sight, of greater comfort and accommodation within.

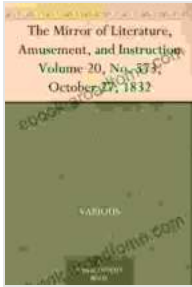

"When we reached the undressing-room, this prepossession was still further strengthened. Here we found a large hall, well lighted from above, having on three of its sides elevated recesses for the visitors, and on the fourth, the passage from the outer porch to the hall, and from thence to the inner bath. At the angles of these raised recesses, and dividing their lower roof, which they supported, from the higher one of the central square,
