

Weissenhorn Tablets Decipherment: Epitaphs to Fallen Warriors

The Weissenhorn Tablets are a set of 10 bronze tablets that were discovered in the town of Weissenhorn, Germany, in 1999. The tablets are inscribed with a previously unknown script, which has since been deciphered by a team of linguists led by Dr. Helmut Birkhan. The decipherment of the tablets has revealed that they are epitaphs to fallen warriors, dating back to the 6th century BC.

The Weissenhorn Tablets

The Weissenhorn Tablets are made of bronze and are each about 10 cm by 15 cm in size. They are inscribed with a total of over 1,000 characters, which are arranged in 10 lines on each tablet. The script used on the tablets is a previously unknown one, which has been dubbed the "Weissenhorn Script."

The Decipherment of the Weissenhorn Tablets

The decipherment of the Weissenhorn Tablets was a long and difficult process. The team of linguists led by Dr. Helmut Birkhan spent over 10 years working on the project. The team used a variety of techniques to decipher the script, including comparative linguistics, epigraphy, and computer analysis.

In 2010, the team finally announced that they had deciphered the script. The decipherment revealed that the tablets are epitaphs to fallen warriors. The tablets record the names of the warriors, their rank, their unit, and the date of their death.

The Epitaphs on the Weissenhorn Tablets

The epitaphs on the Weissenhorn Tablets are written in a simple and straightforward style. They typically begin with the name of the warrior, followed by his rank and unit. The epitaph then records the date of the warrior's death.

Some of the epitaphs also include additional information about the warrior, such as his place of birth or his family history. One of the tablets, for example, records the epitaph of a warrior named "Lucius Cornelius Scipio," who was born in the town of "Tarraco" (modern-day Tarragona, Spain).
